Paddle-wheel 1. [See PADDLE sb. 1 3]

1. A wheel used for propelling a boat or ship: as originally tried, consisting of or having a series of paddles or paddle-like spokes inserted in an axle, drum, or wheel, whence the name; but, eventually, having floats or paddle-boards fitted more or less radially round the circumference, so as to press backward like a succession of paddles against the water. These wheels rotate on a horizontal axis, so that only the lower paddle-boards are under water; they are generally arranged in pairs one on each side of the vessel; in river-steamer, sometimes single and placed in the stern

Petty called his suggested wheel with actual paddles a 'paddle-wheel', but the term was app. avoided by the inventors and theorists of the 18th c., who wrote simply of 'the wheel', 'water-wheel', 'rowing-wheel', 'revolving oars', etc. And at the eventual employment of the wheel with float-boards instead of paddles, the name 'paddle-wheel' was at first felt to be inappropriate, but it gradually came in after 1815.

Padlock (pæ dlɒk), sb. Formerly often as two words, pad lock, or hyphenated, pad-lock. [f. pad, of uncertain meaning + LOCK sb. 2]

An obvious suggestion is that the first element is PAD sb. 4, basket, pannier, hamper. But there is no early evidence that a pad lock was orig. used to fasten a pannier. Also, if pad in Rogers' Agric. & Prices, cited under PAD sb. 4, occurs in the orig. documents, these are much earlier than any instance yet found of pad, ped, 'basket', which is besides of rare and local occurrence.

Paduasoy (pæ diu, āsoi) Forms: a. 7-8 poudesoy, 7 poodesoy, 8 pudisway. b. 7- paduasoy; 8 paduasuy, (paddi-, pattisway), pada-, padesoy, 9 padusoy [Poudesoy (poodesoy, pudisway) is F. pou-de-soie (1667 Littré), poul de soie, poul de soie (1389-94 in Godef. Compl.), of unascertained origin, in recent F. spelt poul-de-soie and POULT-DE-SOIE, the latter also in 19th c. English. The forms in -sway, -sway represent the 17-18th c. F. pronunciation of soie as soè, souè, souè, the rimes show this still in 1730 when the spelling was paduasoy. Paduasoy is, in appearance, a combination of Padua, Eng. name of the Italian city + F. soie silk. (Padua has long had manufactures of silk and other textiles, and a kind of narrow silk ribbon is thence named in F. padou, in 1642 padoue. Oudinot). But Padua soy could not well be of Eng. formation, since soy, soye, soie, was never in Eng. use. Nor could it originate in French, where 'Padua silk' would be soie de Padoue, not Padoue soie. The probability then is that paduasoy was an Eng. corruption of pou-de-soie or poudesoy, app. by association with Padua say, a kind of SAY or serge, actually from Padua, which had been known in England since 1633 or earlier

[Note The word in the preceding senses is known only in English, and in the Anglo-Latin pagina. The two main early senses were 'scene displayed on a stage', and 'stage on which a scene is exhibited or acted'. The relative order of these is not certain, but, so far as instances have been found, the sense 'scene' appears first. The Anglo-L. pagina is in form identical with the known ancient L. pagina leaf (of a book), PAGE sb. 1, and it is noteworthy that from pagina French had, beside the popularly descended page, a literary form pagine, pagene, 'page of a book', which also came into Eng. in the forms PAGINF, pagynie, pagen, and even (in 15th c.) pagent, forms which are identical with some of those of pageant. There is thus no difficulty so far as concerns form in identifying pagina 'pageant' with pagina, pagine, pagyn, pagent, 'leaf' or 'page'. And it is easy to conceive how the sense 'page' or 'leaf' of a MS. play, might have passed into that of 'scene' or 'act'; but direct evidence connecting the two has not been found. On the other hand, some, who take 'stage' as the earlier sense, have suggested for pagina a possible passage of sense from 'tablet or slab (for inscription)' to 'board', and so to 'stage'; or have seen in the 14-15th c. Anglo-Latin pagina a more or less independent formation from the stem pag- of L. pangere to fix, cognate with L. compages, compago, compagina 'fixing together', 'joining', compagnata 'fixed together' (whence perh. 'framework'), or have thought it a representative, in some way, of L. pagina, Gr. πῆγμα 'a framework fastened or joined together', spec. 'a movable stage or scaffold used in theatres'. This last exactly gives the sense of pagina, 'pageant', and not only has Du Cange examples of med. L. pagina as 'a wooden machine on which statues are placed', but Cotgrave has F. pageante 'a stage or frame whereon Pageants be set or carried'. Thus it is indisputable that 'pageant' in the sense 'stage' would exactly render L. pagina, and it is further true that the stem pag- of pagina is cognate with πηγ- of πηγμα; but of any actual historical relation between the forms of these words, or any passage of pagina into πῆγμα in med. L., there is no trace. It had been supposed that an earlier Anglo-L. example of pagina, in a sense like 'boarding', existed in the final paragraph of the 12th or 13th c. treatise of Alexander Neckham De Universalibus, printed (very inaccurately) in T. Wright's Vol. of Vocabularies 1857, pp. 96-119, from MS. Cott. Titus D. 20, ff. 48 b, where Wright has 'ut linguum hujus pagine forti aderat tegminibus'; but the actual reading of the MS is 'ut linguum hic compagine forti ad[hi]ereat tegminibus', so that the supposed pagina 'boarding' has no existence.]

|| Pahlavi (pālāvī), a. and sb. Also Pehlevi (pēlēvī), Pehlvi. [Persian Pahlavī, Parthian, f. Pahlav = Parthava, Parthia.] The name given by the followers of Zoroaster to the character in which are written the ancient translations of their sacred books and some other works of the same age; now used generally to designate a kind of written language, or rather a mode of writing the language, used in Persia under the Sāsānian kings; loosely, Old Persian.

'The hot strife which raged till recently as to whether Pahlavi is Semitic or Persian has been closed by the discovery that it is merely a way of writing Persian, in which the Persian words are partly represented—to the eye not to the ear—by their Semitic equivalents'. Thus 'for bread' they wrote lhma, i. e. the Aramaic lahmā, but they pronounced nām, which is the common Persian word for bread. Similarly usra, the Aramaic usri flesh, was pronounced as the Persian gōsh. The alphabet actually used was derived from the Old Aramaic. Prof. Noldeke in Encycl. Brit.

† Paiocke. [Known only in the passage cited. It has been variously viewed by editors as a misprint for paiocke, peiocke, or other obs form of peacock, or as some dialect form of that word, or as being the older spelling (with i for y) of payock, for an alleged northern Sc pea-jock = peacock. Various other conjectures have been offered.

The spelling peiocke or peiocke is found in the First Folio in the 5 other places where the word occurs, and there seems no reason why Hamlet should here use a stray dialect word. The context suggests that Hamlet was going to say 'A very, very Ass', but checked himself at the last word and substituted this.]

Palaother, paleo- (pæ-lî-ôth'j'j', pæ-lî-ô-). Often in L. form palaotherium. [f. PALAEO- + Gr. θηρίον beast] A perissodactyl mammal of the extinct genus Palaotherium, comprising several species of tapir-like form, varying from the size of a horse to that of a hog; their fossil remains are found in Eocene and Miocene strata. (In the Eng. form extended to other members of the extinct family Palaotheriidae)

1815 W. PHILLIPS *Outl. Palaotype (pæ-lî-ôtîp'). [f. PALAEO- + TYPE.] A system of writing devised by A. J. Ellis, in which the 'old types' (i.e. existing Roman letters and other characters), in their various forms and combinations, are used to form a universal phonetic alphabet. Also attrib. or as adj. Hence Palaotypic (-tî-pîk) a.

1867 A. J. ELLIS E. E. Pronunc. i 1 In order to be convenient to the Printer and Writer, the old types, παλαιὸν should be used, and no accented letters, few turned, and still fewer mutilated letters should be employed. The system of writing here proposed to fulfil these conditions will, in consequence of the last, be termed Palaetypography. Ibid. 13 In order to fix the value of the palaetypic letters, they are on p. 15 compared with those of Mr. Melville Bell's Visible Speech. 1875 Ibid. iv p. 21. Palaetozoic, paleo- (παλαιοζωϊκός, pālīōzōikós), a Geol. [f. PALAEO- + Gr. ζωή life, (zō-ōs living + -iō)]

1. Characterized by, containing, or pertaining to ancient forms of life. As introduced by Sedgwick, in 1838, it was applied to the Cambrian and Silurian strata; as extended by Phillips, 1841, it comprises all the fossiliferous strata up to the Permian, the higher strata being Mesozoic and Cainozoic.

1838 SEDGWICK in Q. Trans. Geol. Soc. II 685 Class II or Palaetozoic Series. This includes all the groups of formations between Class I (Primary stratified rocks called by Sedgwick Protozoic) and the Old Red Sandstone, and subdivided as follows: 1. Lower Cambrian; 2. Upper Cambrian; 3. Silurian System. 1840 PHILLIPS in Penny Cycl. XVI 489/2 We include in the term 'Palaetozoic', all the generally argillaceous and arenaceous strata between the mica schist and the old red-sandstone. Ibid. XVII 154/1 The term Palaetozoic may be retained, though it should be found that the application of it ought to be extended so as to include the carboniferous rocks or even the magnesian limestone. This indeed is not unlikely. 1841 PHILLIPS Palaetozoic Fossils Devon 150, I have suggested the proposed titles; Cainozoic Strata. Mesozoic Strata. Palaetozoic Strata. Upper = Magnesian Limestone formation, Carboniferous System; Middle = (Eifel and South Devon); Lower = Transition Strata; Primary Strata. 1856 DARWIN in Zool. & Geol. (1857) II. 80 Not a fragment of secondary or palaetozoic rock has been found. 1880 HAUGHTON *Phys. Palaetozoology, paleo- (-ζωολογία) [f. PALAEO- + ZOOLOGY.] That department of zoology, or of palaetontology, which treats of extinct or fossil animals. (Correlative to PALAETOPHYTOLOGY.)

1857 in MAYNARD Expos. Lex. 1861 R. E. GRANT *Tub. View Prim. Dm. Anim. Palaetiology (pālīōiōlōgī) rare. Also palaetio-. [(for palaetio-*), f. Gr. παλαίος ancient + ἔτιολογία; after palaetontology] Used by Whewell for the application of existing principles of cause and effect to the explanation of past phenomena.

1837 WHWELL Hist. Induct. Sc. xviii. III. 481 The sciences which treat of causes have sometimes been termed palaetiological, a portion of that science on which we are about to enter, geology, has been termed palaetiology, since it treats of beings which formerly existed. Hence, combining these two notions, the term palaetiology appears to be not inappropriate, to describe those speculations which thus refer to actual past events, but attempt to explain them by laws of causation.

So Palætiological, a, of, belonging to, or using the methods of palaetiology; Palætiologist, one who investigates or treats of a subject in a palaetiological way.

1837 WHWELL Hist. Induct. Sc. xviii. III. 486 Palaetiological sciences undertake to refer changes to their causes. Ibid. 487 The tendencies [etc.], which direct man to architecture and sculpture, to civil government, to rational and grammatical speech, must be in a great degree known to the palaetologist of art, of society, and of language, respectively. 1840 PHILIP, *Induct. 2. More specifically, a treatise of the size and form above described on some subject or question of current or temporary interest, personal, social, political, ecclesiastical, or controversial, on which the writer desires to appeal to the public.

This is merely a consequential specialization, arising from the fact that works of this kind are those for which the pamphlet form is now mainly employed.

[Note: The amatory poem of Pamphilus appears as Pamflet in the Middle Dutch Floris & Blanchefleur of Diderik van Assenede (c 1250) l. 333, where it is said of the hero and heroine 'Ende men se oec te lesene sette In Juvenale ende in Panfette, Ende in Ovidio de Aite Amandi' (And they were set also to read In Juvenal and in Panflet, And in Ovid on the Art of Loving). In French, Pamphlet appears in the inventory of the Library of the Louvre (Chas. V, and Chas. VI) dispersed by John, Duke of Bedford (L. Delisle Cabinet des Manuscrits III. 160). As to its popularity, the students of the University of Paris were rebuffed because they preferred this erotic production to more edifying reading. Pamphilus was also well known in England, and is twice quoted or referred to by Chaucer; also by Gower Mirour 14449 (where see Editor's note). To connect the work with our 'pamphlet', we have to suppose that here also, as in France and the Low Countries, it was familiarly termed Pamphlet or Pamflet, and that this name was in course of time extended to other opuscula produced or circulated 'in pamphlet form', i.e. as small detached works. This transference of sense must have been complete before 1340, when the name was applied in Philobiblon to what were evidently serious treatises, and before Thomas Usk, Hoccleve, and Lydgate applied it to single works of their own.]

Pan (pæn), s.² [a. Gr. Πάν.] The name of a Greek rural deity, represented as having the head, arms, and chest of a man, while his lower parts were those of a goat, of which he sometimes also bore the horns and ears.

The original seat of his worship was in Arcadia, and he was supposed to preside over shepherds and flocks, and to delight in rural music; he was also regarded as the author of sudden and groundless terror seizing upon beasts or men (PANIC), in later times, from association of his name with πᾶν the all, everything, the universe, he was considered as an impersonation of Nature, of which his attributes were taken as mysterious symbols.

Pan, obs. form of PANE, obs. Sc. form of PAIN.

Pan-, combining form and formative element, repr Gr. pan- from pān, neuter of pās all, which was freely used in Greek, esp. with adjs. to which it stood in advb relation in the sense 'all, wholly, entirely, altogether, by all, of all', as in πανάγιστος altogether good, πανάγιος all-holy, πανακίς all-healing, πανάρσιος best of all, παναρμόνιος suited to all musical modes, πάνδημος pertaining to all the people, public, πάνοπλος fully-armed, πανσέληνος of the full moon, πάνσοφος all-wise; so from national names, as πανελληνίος of all the Greeks, πανιώνιος of all the Ionians, also in sbs., etc. derived from these adjs., and some other sbs., as πανδέκτης an all-receiver, πανηγυρῶν ruler of all, πανήγυρις a universal or general assembly, πανοπλία panoply.

Hence pan- occurs in English in words taken or derived from Greek, and in many others formed more or less on the same analogy either in English, med. or mod Latin, or French. It is especially common with national names, after πανελληνίος, πανιώνιος, etc., where it has become a living suffix, prefixed whenever needed. Before a labial pan- became παμ-, and before a guttural pan- (= pay-), as πάμφιλος, παμφίλητος beloved of all, πάγκρεας the sweetbread, the pancreas, the former of these is retained in some English derivatives (see PAM-).

The following are examples of the uses of pan-; the more important words will be found in their places as Main words.

1. With national names, and words formed in imitation of them, with the sense 'Of, pertaining to, or comprising all (those indicated in the body of the word)'; with sbs. in -ism and -ist, generally expressing the notion of or aspiration for the political union of all those indicated, a sense which also tends to colour the adj. instrument the invention of which was attributed to Pan (But the word was prob. of foreign origin)] A stringed musical instrument of the cither type, the same as the BANDOBE

The original Greek and Roman pandura is described as a kind of lute with three strings, such an instrument is still used in some eastern lands under the name pandur. But the original type has, at different times, and in different countries, undergone many changes in form, in the number and material of the strings, the use or non-use of a plectrum, etc. Equally numerous are the modifications of the name of BANDOBE, BANJO, MANDOLINE. The changes of thing and name have not always gone together. the Neapolitan pandura, for instance, retaining the ancient name, is 'a musical instrument larger than the mandoline, strung with eight metal wires, and played with a quill'

For ulterior etymology see Note below. The sense in which the word became known in Western Europe is involved in the history of Trenck's body of pandours]

1. In pl. The name borne by a local force organized in 1741 by Baron Trenck on his own estates in Croatia to clear the country near the Turkish frontier of bands of robbers; subsequently enrolled as a regiment in the Austrian Army, where, under Trenck, their rapacity and brutality caused them to be dreaded over Germany, and made Pandour synonymous in Western Europe with 'brutal Croatian soldier'.

[Note. The word pandūr, with all or some of the senses mentioned above, is found in nearly all the South-Slavonic (Serbian) dialects, and in Magyar, also as pandur in Roumanian, it has entered Turkish as pandūr. Earlier forms in Magyar and Serbo-croatian were bändūr, dändūr; the former is still used in and near Ragusa. The word is not native either in Magyar or Slavonic, and the question of its origin and course of diffusion in these langs. is involved in considerable obscurity. But Slavonic scholars are now generally agreed in referring it through the earlier bändūr, dändūr, to med. L. pandurus, orig. a follower of a standard or banner' (see BANNER), or to some Italian or Venetian word akin to this. Among senses evidenced by Du Cange for pandurus (and bannarius), are those of 'guard of corn-fields and vineyards', also 'summoner, apparitor', which are both senses of pandūr; It. pandore (Venetian bändore) has also the sense of 'summoner'. The alleged derivation of the word from Pandur or Pandur Pustia, 'a village in Lower Hungary', given in Ersch & Gröber's Cyclopædia, and repeated in many English Dictionaries, is absolutely baseless.]

6. Scots Law In the phrase on or upon the panel = upon (his, one's) trial. Also, in later use, in the panel, etc.

The original sense of panel here is conjectural. It seems most probable that (on the analogy of sense 4) it meant a slip of parchment, containing the indictment, or the name or names of the persons indicted. To be on the panel would thus be to be indicted, and so on one's trial. It would also be easy to use the term elliptically for the name or names, and so, the person or persons, on the panel, as in b, where note that the word is collective. In later times, 'the panel' has been sometimes understood as a place, viz. 'the bar of the court' (so Jamieson), or the dock. Cf. the phrases in the panel, to put or bring into the panel, to enter the panel.

Panlogism (pæn'lodʒiz'm). [ad. mod. L. panlogismus, f. Gr. pan- all + λόγος speech, word, reason: see -ISM.] A term formed by J. E. Erdmann (Deutsche Speculation seit Kant (1853) II. 853) on the analogy of pantheismus, to describe the philosophy of Hegel, as one which holds that only the rational is truly real. (Generally used with an implication of dissent from the position so characterized.) Hence Panlogical, Panlogistic a., pertaining to or of the nature of panlogism.

1871 LEWES Hist. Philos. (ed 4) II. 679 By Erdmann, Hegel's system is happily characterized as Panlogism rather than Pantheism, since, instead of presenting the universe as the evolution of God, he presents it, and God also, as the evolution of the abstract idea.

+ Panmixia (pænmi ksia). Biol. [mod. L., = Ger. panmixia (Weismann), f. Gr. pan- all + -mixia, from mixis mixing, mingling; lit. 'universal or general mingling' (sc. of ancestral qualities).]

Weismann's term for a supposed promiscuous reproduction of all manner of ancestral qualities or tendencies, consequent on the cessation of natural selection in relation to organs which have become useless or little used, and tending to the degeneration of these organs.

1889 POUTON, etc. tr Weismann's Ess. Heredity 90 This suspension of the preserving influence of natural selection may be termed Panmixia, for all individuals can reproduce themselves and thus stamp their characters upon the species, and not only those which are in all respects, or in respect to some single organ, the fittest, the great variability of most domesticated animals essentially depends upon this principle.
 1890 RAY LANKESTER in Nature 27 Mar 487/2 The doctrine of panmixia is this. When there is no longer, owing to changed conditions of life, any use for an organ, it will cease to be the subject of natural selection. Consequently all possible variations . . . will have (so far as the now lapsed use of the organ is concerned) an equal chance.
 1895 MIVART in Harper's Mag. Mar. A fortuitous mixture of ancestral tendencies called panmixia.

HOWELL Let. As no new 'panniers' are now appointed, the name will drop out of use.

[Note. The name pannier is merely colloquial, and does not occur in the Records. It may have originated or been derived in some way from that of the PANNIERMAN, but it is not identical with that word, as erroneously assumed by Crabbe (followed by later dictionaries), still less is it, as sometimes stated, the source of that word. There is no evidence to connect it with L. pānarius (bread-seller) or pānarius (cloth-seller), as conjectured by some.]

This hypothesis is currently known as 'panspermism', or the 'theory of omnipresent germs', or the 'germ-theory'. 1874 Contemp. Rev. XXIV 518 It rested more especially with the Panspermists, who chose still to be opponents of 'spontaneous generation', to show this belief was erroneous. 1878 Tyndall Fragm. Sc. II. xiii.

Panspermia: see PANSPERM.

Panspermic (pæn'spɜːmɪk), a. [f. Gr. παν-σπερμα- composed of, or containing all sorts of seeds (f. παν- all + σπέρμα seed) + -IC.] Of or pertaining to panspermism.

Rev.* XXIII 710 The hypothesis of Panspermism supposes that these minute living things have merely developed in the fluids owing to the accidental presence of invisible germs thrown off from pre-existing living organisms. 1881 Tyndall Floating Matter of Air 208 Panspermism.

Panspermy (pæn'spɜːmɪ) Also in mod. L. form panspermia. [ad Gr. πανσπερμία the doctrine of Anaxagoras and Democritus that the elements were a mixture of all the seeds of things, f. πανσπερμος. see PANSPERMIC.] The biogenetic theory that the atmosphere is full of minute germs which develop on finding a favourable environment. The quot from Chambers is merely translated from the Fr Dictionnaire de Tricouze, and does not prove English usage. In French the name became associated with the tight garments of the 15-16th c., familiar in the paintings of the Italian artists of the period; but this was nowhere a contemporary application. From this arose the use in c.

The subjective analysis of the name, as from Gr. παν- all + θηρ beast, gave rise to many fancies and fables see Ph. de Thaun Bestiaire 224, etc.]

1. Another name for the Leopard (Felis pardus); popularly applied to large leopards.

As with other exotic animals, the name, handed down from the Latin writers, was known long before the animal, all the early references merely reflect the statements of ancient authors and their mediæval continuators. These statements were long believed to refer to a beast distinct from the leopard, a belief encouraged by there being two Latin names panthera and pandus, as to the relation between which the ancient writers themselves were not clear, and by fabulous notions as to the generation of the leopard as a hybrid between the lion and the 'pard', and as to the sweet fragrance fabled to be exhaled by the panther. Down to modern times (cf. quot. 1813) the 'panther' was supposed to be at least a larger and more powerful kind of leopard, a distinction not scientifically tenable Papa¹ (pāpā). Also 8 pappa. [a. F. papa, in 1552 pappa (Hatz-Darm.) = It. pappa 'the first word that children are taught to call their father by, as ours say Dad, Daddie, or Bab' (Florino 1598, 1611), L. pāpa father, papa; cf. Gr. pāpas, later pāpas 'a child's word for father'. From F. also Ger. papa, introduced in 17th c. as papā, and at first only in courtly use, passing into common use late in 18th c. In Eng. in 17th and early 18th c. the form varied between pāpā and pāpā; from the latter the American pāpā.] A word employed as the equivalent of father chiefly used in the vocative, or prec. by a possess. pronoun (as 'my papa'); also without any article in the manner of a proper name (e.g. 'I will ask Papa'); less usually with a or in plural.

At its first introduction from Fr., courtly and polite, and used even by adults, long considered 'genteel'; but more and more left to children, and in second half of 19th c. largely abandoned even by them.

The Gr. and L. words (meaning 'Father') were, like the latter, and mod. Romanic pāpā, addressed or applied to spiritual fathers, in the West at first to bishops generally (as in Prudentius and Gregory of Tours), but gradually confined to the Bishop of Rome (see Pope); in the East, in the form pāpā, applied more widely, so as to include the lower clergy. In this sense also sometimes rendered in Eng. by 'pope'.

Zucato's Patent* No. 1078, I shall refer to the paper so prepared as papyrographic paper. 1890 W. R. WARE Wood-working Tools (Cent. Dict.) Papyrography (pāpū'rogrāfi), [f. as piec + -GRAPHY]. A term applied to a process of writing or drawing on paper and transferring the design to a zinc plate whence it is printed.

The name had already been given in French (papyrographie) to various transfer processes introduced in 1819, 1822, and 1840 respectively. More recently it has been loosely applied in English to Capt. Abney's papyrotype, etc. 1848 H. E. STRICKLAND in Jardine's Contrib. Ornith. 20, I found that drawings made on paper with this lithographic chalk could be readily transferred to zinc, and would supply an indefinite number of impressions. This new process, the original design being made on paper, I have distinguished by the name of Papyrography. 1849 P. H. DE LA MORTE (title) Anastatic Printing and Papyrography. 1888 LITZKE Lithographic Processes 112 Capt. Abney's Papyrography [=Papyrotype].

1874 ABNEY Instr. Photogr. 122 To make a transfer by Papyrotype. 1892 BROTHERS Photogr. 159 A process called Papyrotype was patented by Capt. Abney [Specif. 615 of 1873].

Para-1 (parā), before a vowel or h usually par-, repr. Gr. para-, nap-, combining form of para prep., occurring in words already formed in Greek, then adaptations, and derivatives, and in modern words formed on the model of these, and, in certain uses, as a living element, in the formation of technical nomenclature.

As a preposition, Gr. para had the sense 'by the side of, beside', whence 'alongside of, by, past, beyond', etc. In composition it had the same senses, with such cognate adverbial ones as 'to one side, aside, amiss, faulty, irregular, disordered, improper, wrong'; also expressing subsidiary relation, alteration, perversion, simulation, etc. These senses also occur in English derivatives: see PARABAPTISM, PARABLE, PARADOX, PARASITE, PARALLEL; PARENTHESIS; PARHELION; PARISH; PAROCHIAL, PARODY, PAROXYSM, etc. Two groups of less usual technical words follow here.

1. Terms (substantival or adjectival) chiefly of Anatomy and Natural History, denoting or relating to an organ or part situated beside or near that denoted by the second element, or standing in some subsidiary relation to it, and of Pathology, denoting diseases affecting such parts, or designating disordered conditions and functions. These last are often Latin in form.

2 In Chemistry, para- is used to form:

a. Names of substances that are (or have been supposed to be) modifications of those to the names of which para- is prefixed, or that have been produced along with or instead of these, or, sometimes, that merely occur with them.

This nomenclature appears to have been first used by Berzelius in 1830 (cf. Poggendorff's Annalen XIX 328, where he introduces acidum paraphosphoricum and paraphosphates, also acidum paratartaricum, a. paratanannicum). In some cases the para- derivatives are isomers or polymers of the simply-named substance, e.g. paraaldehyde, paratoluene, but in others they are neither isomeric with nor closely related to them, e.g. naphthalene C₁₀H₈, paranaphthalene C₁₄H₁₀.

Parabenzene (parabenzol) (C₆H₆)_n a hydrocarbon isomeric with benzene, occurring along with it in light coal oil. || Paraburine, an alkaloid, C₂₁H₄₈N₂O, obtained from the bark of the box-tree. || Paracamphoric a., in p. acid, inactive camphoric acid. || Paracarbin, a red substance allied to carthamin, contained in the bark of Cornus sanguinea, dogwood. || Paracellulose, a supposed modification of CELLULOSE, occurring in the cellular tissue and pith of plants. || Paracitric a., in p. acid = ACONITIC acid. || Paraconic a. Soc. Lex.*). || Paraformaldehyde, a polymer of formal or methyl aldehyde. || Parafumaric a., in p. acid = MALEIC acid. || Paralbumin, a form of albumin found by Scherer in ovarian cysts. || Paramaleic a., in p. acid = FUMARIC acid. || Paramallic a., in p. acid = Diglycollic acid, O 2 (CH₂COOH) see GLYCOLLIC. || Parameconic a., in p. acid = COMENIC acid. || Paramenispermene, an alkaloid left as an insoluble residue after the extraction of menispermene, C₁₈H₁₂NO₂, of which it is an isomer. || Paramic a., in p. acid, derived from paramide. || Paramide = MELLITIMIDE. || Paramorphia, paramorphine = THEBAINE, C₁₀H₂₁NO₃. || Paramylen = DECENE, C₁₀H₂₀. || Paramylum, -one, a carbohydrate closely allied to starch (AMYLUM) of formula (C₆H₁₀O₅)_n, found in starch-like granules in Euglena viridis, a flagellate infusorian. || Paramyonogen, a proteid occurring in muscle-plasma. || Paranaphthalene = ANTHRAENE. || Paraniline, a polymer of ANILINE, C₁₂H₁₁N₃, obtained in long white silky needles. || Paranthracene, a crystalline isomeric modification of b (More systematically) Names of isomeric benzene di-derivatives in which the two hydrogen-atoms replaced by another element or radical are symmetrically disposed in the benzene ring, being separated on each side by two other atoms; as 1 and 4 in the ring 1,2,3,4, e.g. *para*dichlorobenzene, C₆Cl₂H₄ClH. So cinnamic (1,2) and para-cinnamic (1,4) acids, etc. See ORTHO-2.

As these compound names are formed systematically, and are in number unlimited, it is not necessary to give any list, of the following 1876 J. Nat. Chem. (1) 207 Few chemists employ the terms para-, meta-, ortho-, in any other sense than as denoting 1, 4, 1, 3, and 1, 2 compounds respectively. 1872 WATTS Dict. Chem. VI. 198 A second series of bi-derivatives of benzene—the Para-series—is produced from dimetobenzene. From this compound is obtained para-nitrobenzene, which may be converted into para-diazonitrobenzene, and from this may be prepared parachloronitrobenzene, parabromonitrobenzene, and para-iodonitrobenzene. These may be converted by reducing agents into parachloroaniline, parabromoaniline, and para-iodoaniline. 1889 Anthony's Photogr. Bull. II. 270 We have called paradihydroxybenzene [or quinol] one of the benzenes, and the prefix para- shows which one; there are two others, one of which is ortho-dihydroxybenzene, or catechol, and the other meta-dihydroxybenzene or resorcinol. There are thus three substances, catechol, resorcinol and quinol, all having the same composition C₆H₄(HO)₂ and distinguished from each other by the prefixes ortho-, meta-, and para- attached to dihydroxybenzene.

(Cf. analogous Fr. and Eng. compounds, as couvre-chef, couvre-feu, make-shift, spend-thrift, ward-robe) Italian para- has been adopted in Fr., which has added paraphuie rain-screen, umbrella, paracrotte mud-guard, parachute, parados, etc. Thence English has PARAPET, PARADOS, PARASOL, PARACHUTE, with occasional humorous nonce-words, as Parabore, defence from bores, and occasional uses of the alien (French) words, paragrandine [L. grandin-em hail], paragrêle [F. grêle hail] protection against hail, parapluie [F. pluie rain] umbrella, paratonnerre [F. tonnerre thunder] lightning-conductor, paravent [F. vent wind] defence against wind.

Parabanio (παράβαιος), a. Chem. [f. PARA- see below] In parabanic acid, a dibasic acid, CO₂(NH₂CO), produced by the action of nitric acid on uric acid or alloxan; crystallizing in colourless prisms. When boiled with dilute acids, it is converted into oxalic acid and urea, whence it is sometimes called oxalyl carbamide or oxalyl urea. Hence Paraban, a proposed substitute for the name parabanic acid, to express its parallelism to alloxan. Parabamate, a salt of parabanic acid, as argentic parabanate, CO₂(NAgCO).

[Note. The term parabanic was introduced by Liebig and Wohler in 1838 (Annalen XXVI 285), but without any explanation of its formation. As they made parabanic acid by a reaction in which they expected to obtain alloxan, it is prob. that para- was used in the sense 'instead of', 'opposed to', the ending being that of allox-an, -an, and the b merely euphonic. It has been suggested that the latter is a residue of carb-, and that the term was formed to express parallelism of constitution to urea or carbamide, CO₂(NH₂), and to alloxan, CO₂(NH₂CO); but as a fact, it was not till much later that the identity of urea and carbamide was discovered.]

One of the conic sections, the plane curve formed by the intersection of a cone with a plane parallel to a side of the cone, also definable as the locus of a point whose distance from a given point (the focus) is equal to its distance from a given straight line (the directrix).

Sometimes distinguished from parabolas of the higher kind (see b) as the Apollonian or quadratic parabola. It is approximately the path of a projectile under the influence of gravity.

TAYLOR Anc. & Mod Geom. 82 The parabola was so called from the equality of the square of the ordinate of any point upon it to the rectangle contained by its abscissa and the latus rectum. It is reported by Proclus in his Commentaries on the first book of Euclid that the terms parabola, hyperbola, and ellipse had been used by the Pythagoreans to express the equality or inequality of areas, and were subsequently transferred to the conic curves.

b. Extended to curves of higher degrees resembling a parabola in running off to infinity without approaching to an asymptote, or having the line at infinity as a tangent, and denoted by equations analogous to that of the common parabola.

[Note To the earlier Greek geometers, including Archimedes, b. c. 287-212, who investigated only sections perpendicular to the surface of the cone, the parabola was known as $\theta\rho\beta\omicron\upsilon\gamma\alpha\upsilon\alpha\ \kappa\omega\upsilon\omicron\nu\ \tau\omicron\mu\eta$ = sectio reatunguli conii [the [perpendicular] section of a right-angled cone]. The use of parabolē, 'application', in this sense is due to Apollonius of Peiga, c. 210 b. c., and, with him, referred to the fact that a rectangle on the abscissa, having an area equal to the square on the ordinate, can be 'applied' to the latus rectum, without either excess (as in the hyperbola), or deficiency (as in the ellipse). (See C. TAYLOR Anc. & Mod. Geom. 195; T. L. HEATH Apollonius of Perga, Introduct lxxx.) But an explanation of the name, from the much more obvious property of the paraboloid of the section to a side of the cone, is given by Eutocius of Ascalon c. A. D. 550, and is frequent in later writers.]

[ad (perh. through F. paradoxus, 14th c in Hatz-Darm.) L. paradoxus, -on, sb., properly neuter of parados-us, Gr. napádeīan-ós adj. contrary to received opinion or expectation, f. napá past, beyond, contrary to + deīfa opinion; in Gr. and L. also used subst., esp. in pl napádeīfa Stoical paradoxes: cf. Cicero Paradoxa, procem. 4. In Fr. and Eng. the sb. is the earlier and more important.]

1. A statement or tenet contrary to received opinion or belief; often with the implication that it is marvellous or incredible; sometimes with unfavourable connotation, as being discordant with what is held to be established truth, and hence absurd or fantastic; sometimes with favourable connotation, as a correction of vulgar error. (In actual use rare since 17th c., though often insisted upon by writers as the proper sense.)

Lond. News* 26 Apr. 535/3 A paradox is a proposition really or apparently contradictory to a commonly received idea. It is, as its name indicates, a conceit contrary to opinion, but not contrary to reason. A position contrary to reason is a paralogism.

† b. Rhet. [repr L. paradoxum] A conclusion or apodosis contrary to what the audience has been led up to expect. Obs.

1678 PHILLIPS (ed. 4), Paradox. In Rhetoric, it is something which is cast in by the by, contrary to the opinion or expectation of the Auditor, and is otherwise called Hyponoma.

2. A statement or proposition which on the face of it seems self-contradictory, absurd, or at variance with common sense, though, on investigation or when explained, it may prove to be well-founded (or, according to some, though it is essentially true).

1569 CROWLEY Soph. Dr. Watson i. 187 Your strange Paradox of Christs, eating of his owne fleshe. 1607 J. NORDEN Swet. Dial iv. 125. I can tell you a piete paradox. Polit.* Sc. 1 (1896) 3 In my opinion, to lecture on political science is to lecture on history. Here is the Paradox—I use the word in its original sense of a proposition which is really true, though it sounds false. 1902 Daily Chron. 30 Oct. 3/1 Perhaps the only immortal paradoxes are the divine paradoxes called Beatiitudes, for each generation sees their truth, but as no one ever acts upon them, their paradox comes with perpetual freshness to every age.

b. Often applied to a proposition or statement that is actually self-contradictory, or contradictory to reason or ascertained truth, and so, essentially absurd and false.

Hence some (cf. quot. 1639) have denied statements to be paradoxes when they can be proved after all to be true, or have called them 'apparent paradoxes' (quot. 1876), when they are real paradoxes in sense 2.

I.* Pref. 24 If I do not fall square, and paragon, in every point of duty to my master 1672 SIR T. BROWNE Let. to Friend § 9 Those jewels were paragon, without flaw, hair, ice, or cloud 1825 R. P. WARD Tremaine III. xv. 245 Presuming to have had opinions, which this paragon Lord does not approve.

[Note. This word appears first in Italian (14th c.), whence in Fr. Sp. etc. The notion of Dietz that paragon originated in Sp. from the prep. phrase para con (which is sometimes = 'in comparison with') is historically untenable. But it is not certain whether the original sense of It. paragone was 'comparison', or 'touch-stone'; in the latter sense it might stand for pietra di paragone. For the etymology, Tobler (Zeitschr. Rom. Phil. (1880) IV. 373) suggested derivation from the Gr. vb. παράγων 'to sharpen or whet one thing against another', f. ἀκόν 'whetstone', supposing that this may have developed the sense 'touch-stone', or that the It. vb. paragonare may have been formed from παράγων, whence paragone the act of doing this, pietra di paragone 'comparison stone, touch stone'. A med. Gr. παράγων is cited as applied to a smooth hard stone used to polish the gold laid on in illuminating. But the suggestion presents various difficulties.]

By some writers restricted to the change of the initial letter or letters, as in Biberus Mero for Tiberius Nero, but Aristotle included such as κόλας for κόλας. a 1679 HOBBS Rhetoric III. x. Paragraph (pəˈræɡrəf), sb. Also 6-7 -graf(e) [a. F. paragraphe (13th c. in Hatz-Darm.) = It. paragrafo, ad late L. paragraphe-us, a. Gr. παράγραφος orig. a short horizontal stroke drawn below the beginning of a line in which a break in the sense occurs (see Kenyon Palaeogr. 27), also = παράγραφη, a passage so marked; f. παρά- by the side + -γραφος written.]

1. A symbol or character (now usually ¶ or ¶) formerly used to mark the commencement of a new section or part of a narrative or discourse; now, sometimes introducing an editorial obiter dictum or protest, and sometimes as a reference to a marginal note or foot-note

Its original use is common in Middle English MSS (where the form is often a red or blue ¶, ¶, or ¶). It was retained by the early printers, and remains in the Bible of 1611 (but only as far as Acts xx), no doubt because every verse begins a new line, so that the method of indicating a paragraph by 'indenting' (as done by Tindale, Coverdale, and the Revisers of 1882-3) was not available.

Gram.* (ed. 5) I. 412 A Paragraph ¶ denotes the beginning of a new subject, or a sentence not connected with the foregoing. This character is chiefly used in the Old, and in the New Testaments 1824 J. JOHNSON Type II. in 52 At present, paragraphs are seen only in Bibles.

2. A distinct passage or section of a discourse, chapter, or book, dealing with a particular point of the subject, the words of a distinct speaker, etc., whether consisting of one sentence or of a number of sentences that are more closely connected with each other than with what stands before and after. Such a passage was at first usually indicated by the mark described above; but afterwards, as now, by beginning on a new line, which is indented or set back by the space of an 'em-quad', and ends without running on to the next passage; hence, in reference to typography or manuscript, a paragraph is a portion of the text between two such breaks; but, in a less technical sense, it is sometimes applied to any passage which, from its nature, might or ought to be so indicated in writing or printing.

3. A short passage, notice, or article in a newspaper or journal, without a heading, or having only a side heading, an item of news.

The paragraphs here are quite independent and unconnected with each other, but they constitute collectively a summary of local or general news or gossip, or of 'notes' on some special subject or department.

Parakite (παράκιτι) [In sense a, f. PARA- (OURE) + KITE, in b, f. Gr παρά, PARA-1 beyond + KITE] a. A kind of large kite constructed so as to be inflated by the wind like a parachute, proposed by Simmons in 1875 for military use. b. A kind of tailless kite devised by Woglom in 1896 for various scientific purposes.

1875 10th Rep. Aeronaut. Sec. 75 An attempt was made by Mr. Simmons, the aeronaut, to supplement the employment of a balloon in warfare by a kite, which, from the peculiar nature of its construction, he designated the parakite. It was, in fact, a combination of the parachute and kite. 1895 BADEN POWELL in First United Service Inst. 888 Simmons, the aeronaut, tried in 1876 an apparatus under the name of the 'parakite' for raising a military observer. 1896 G. Also transf. (quot. 1881).

In Astronomy there are two kinds of parallax, viz. diurnal and annual, the former when a celestial object is observed from opposite points on the earth's surface, the latter when observed from opposite points of the earth's orbit. As the mean or proper position of the body is that which it would have if viewed in the one case from the earth's centre (or a point in a line with it), in the other case from the centre of its orbit, the parallax is actually calculated and stated from these central points, and called geocentric and heliocentric respectively, the base lines of these being the earth's radius and the radius of its orbit. Horizontal parallax, the diurnal parallax of a heavenly body seen on the horizon.

† Paraphernalia (pærāfērnālīā), sb. pl. [med. L., neuter pl. of paraphernalis (see prec.), short for paraphernalia bona, paraphernal goods.]

1. Law. Those articles of personal property which the law allows a married woman to keep and, to a certain extent, deal with as her own.

The word parapherna was used by the Roman jurists to indicate all property which a married woman sui juris held apart from her dos (dower). Over such property the husband could exercise no rights without his wife's consent. In most modern systems of law, based on the Roman, paraphernalia bona (in Fr. biens paraphernaux) means much the same thing, but in English and Scottish Common law, under which all personal or movable property of a wife vested in suo jure in the husband, the paraphernalia became restricted to such purely personal belongings of a wife as dress, jewels, and the like. These latter were regarded as, in a sense, appropriated to the wife, and on the husband's death they were not treated as part of his succession, and the right of a trustee over them, in the event of the husband's bankruptcy, was restricted. But in neither England nor Scotland did paraphernalia strictly include articles in the nature of household furniture, even though these had been marriage presents to the wife. The effect of the 'Married Women's Property Acts' of 1870, etc., will ultimately be to deprive the term of all significance in English and Scottish legal practice.

Hence Parasphenoidal a. of the nature of or pertaining to the parasphenoid.

Parastacine (parāsstāsīn), a. Zool. [f. mod. L. Parastacus (see defin.) + -INE 1.] Belonging to the genus Parastacus or family Parastacidae of fresh-water Crustacea of the Southern Hemisphere. 1880 HUXLEY Crayfish v. 253 Diagram, Parastacine Plan. Parastannic, Chem. see PARA-1 2.

Parasternal (parāstērnāl), a. Anat. [f. PARA-1 + STERNUM + -AL cf. STERNAL] Lying alongside the sternum or breast-bone.

Parasternal line, a line drawn vertically down the surface of the chest from a point in the collar-bone distant one-third of its length from its inner end. Parasternal region, the space between this line and the edge of the sternum.

1870 S. J. GEL. Auscult. & Percuss. II. § 13 Parasternal (i.e. midway between the side-sternal and nipple lines) Ibid. I. II. Parastichy (parāsstīkī), Bot. [f. PARA-1 + Gr. -στίχιν, from stīx- or row, rank: cf. ORTHOSTICHY.] A secondary spiral or oblique rank of lateral members, as leaves or scales, around the stem or axis, in a phyllotaxis in which the leaves, scales, etc. are close together, as in certain leaf-roses, pine-cones, etc.

1875 BENNETT & DYER tr. Sachs' Bot. I. III. 173 When the members of a spiral phyllotaxis with a constant angle of divergence stand sufficiently close to one another, spiral arrangements are easily seen and followed to the right and left which more or less conceal the genetic spiral. These rows are called Parastiches, and are particularly clear in the cones of species of Pinus. 1884 BOWER & SCOTT De Barry's Phaner. 285 Two bundles come into contact—that from the one side following the parastiches composed of every third leaf, that from the other the parastiches composed of every fifth leaf.

Parastigma, Entom. [mod. L. f. Gr. παρα- beside + στίγμα prick, point, spot. see STIGMA.] A chitinous spot situated beside the stigma on the wings of certain insects, as dragon-flies. So Parastigmatic a., situated beside the stigma, pertaining to the parastigma.

1826 KIRBY & SP. Entomol. III. 377 The Parastigma A corneous spot between the costal and postcostal nerves, distinct from the stigma, observable in the Libellulina.

Parasynesis (parāsīnīsis), Philol. [a. Gr. παρασύνεσις misunderstanding, f. para- in sense 'amiss, wrong' + σύνεσις understanding.] Misunderstanding or misconception of a word, resulting in an alteration or corruption of it. Hence Parasynetic (-sine tik) a., pertaining to or due to parasynesis.

1877 HAIDEMAN Outlines Etymol. 31 Parasynesis, a misunderstanding or misconception of a word all of which is present, as when 'Chinese' is supposed to be a plural, and capable of furnishing 'Chinee' in the singular number. 1885 Trans. Amer. Philol. Assoc. XVI. App. 32 Such parasynetic forms as 'sparier-grass' for 'asparagus', due to misconception of a word, are common enough in Negro.

Parasynovitis, syphilitic, etc. see PARA-1 1.

Parasynthesis (parāsīnīsis), Philol. [mod. a. Gr. παρασύνθεσις, f. para- beside, alongside + σύνθεσις composition, SYNTHESIS.] Derivation from a compound, conjoint combination and derivation, as a process of word-formation. see next.

1862 CHANDLER Grk. Accentuation Pref. xii. It is said that synthesis does, and parasynthesis does not affect the accent, which is really tantamount to saying, that when the accent of a word is known we shall be able to judge whether a Græc grammarian regarded that word as a synthetic or parasynthetic compound. 1884 Amer. J. Philol. July 193 The principle of parasynthesis, i.e. more regularly and extensively developed here [in Portuguese] than in any other one of the Romance group of languages.

Parasynthetic (parāsīnītik), a. (sb.) Philol. [mod. f. Gr. παρασύνθετος 'formed from a compound' (f. para- beside + σύνθετος put together, compounded) + -IC. In mod. f. Parasynthétique.] Formed from a combination or compound of two or more elements, formed by a conjoint process of combination and derivation. b. sb. A parasynthetic formation or derivative.

Applied, esp. in Romantic Philology, to verbs derived from a combination of preposition and object, with the addition of a verbal ending, as aborsio, from præ aborsio, about from à bout, endorser from en dos, etc., also to the derivatives of these, as en-tablé-ment, etc. Many of these parasynthetic derivatives have entered Eng. from French, e.g. accost, embark, endorse, imprison, but native formations of this kind are rarely if ever made in Eng. On parasynthetic derivatives chiefly consist of adjs. and sbs. formed by combining two words in some grammatical relation, and adding to the combination a formative suffix, e.g. from black eye, black-eyed, from silk hat, silk-hatted, from all ages, all aged, from big end, big-endler, from free trade, free-trader, from at home, at homelike, at-homeliness, at homeliness, from get at, get-at-able, etc. Thus black-eyed, big-endler, etc., notwithstanding the hyphen, are not formed from black + eyed, big + endler, etc., but from black eye + -ed, big end + -er, etc., the suffix indicating a formation not upon the element next to it, but upon the combination of the two elements, which, of themselves, without the suffix, are only in grammatical collocation.

1862 [see prec.] 1884 (April) N. E. Dict. v. Asb sb. § 8. Comb. a. In a simulative relation passing into parasynthetic compounds, as ash-bellied, ash-colored. 1884 A. M. So Parasyntheticon, pl. -eta [a. Gr. παρασύνθετον, neut. used subst.], a parasynthetic formation. [Cf. Chærob C 477. 21 in Chandler Grk. Accent (ed. 2) § 417 Παρασύνθετον δε το αὐτὸ συνθετὸν γινώσκοντες, ὡς αὐτὸ τοῦ Ἀρριγῶνος συνθετὸν γίνεται τὸ ἀρριγῶνικὸν παρασύνθετον.] Used in German by Diez Grammat. Rom. Lotze's Logic 362 We distrust any practical project which instead of co-ordinating side by side, paratactically, to use a phrase of syntax, independent conditions of success, lets them depend hypothetically on a web of mutually conditioning presuppositions. 1890 J. S. RICH Chiro. Pro Balbo Notes 50 All the clauses from futur to the end of the sentence are paratactically, not syntactically arranged, that is, they are merely put side by side, and not linked together by particles.

1843 Sir J. HIRSCHL in Phil. Trans. I. 5 Certain rays, which accompany in the spectrum the red and orange rays, and are also copiously emitted by heated bodies short of redness. Pareira (pārē'ra). [ad. Pg. parreira vine trained against a wall; whence parreira brava wild climbing vine, the name given to the Brazilian plant] A drug made of the root of a Brazilian shrub, used in disorders of the urinary passages. Originally understood to be the root of the climbing shrub Cissampelos Pareira or 'Velvet-leaf', the parreira brava of the Portuguese, whence the name, now said to be that of a different shrub, Chondrodendron tomentosum; the 'Velvet-leaf' being distinguished by some as Spurious Pareira (The fact is that, historically, the latter is the real pareira, 'pareira' of pharmacy being a misnomer)

A differentiated colony, like the amphiblastula, with the cells at one end becoming better fitted to take in food, could be transformed into a paranchymula by the migration of differentiated feeding cells into the interior, and the paranchymula could then have been transformed into a true gastrula.

1. In the United Kingdom, and some of the Colonies, the name of a subdivision of a county applied to it primarily in its ecclesiastical aspect, but also as an area recognized for various purposes of civil administration and local government

The name occurs in Norman French in the Laws of William I, c 1075, but has not been found in Eng. before the 13th c. Although the parochial system was more or less developed in many (perhaps most) parts of England before the year 1000, there is no word formed from parochia, nor any directly answering to it, in OE., the nearest equivalents being preost setl 'priest-shure' (Beetes. Inst. xiv in Thorpe Laws), and scrift-setl 'shrift-shure' (Causons of Edgar vi, Ecc. Laws of Cnut xii), both of 11th or late 10th c., the latter rendered parochia in the 13th c. L. version.

a. orig. A township or cluster of townships having its own church, and ministered to by its own priest, parson, or parish clergyman, to whom its tithes and ecclesiastical dues are (or originally were) paid. b. A later division of such an original parish for ecclesiastical purposes only, having its own church and clergyman.

The latter includes the ancient parochial chapelry of some of the large northern parishes (CHAP. 3 b, CHAP. 1 x), and the more recent ecclesiastical districts constituted under the powers given by the various Church Building Acts, distinguished as new ecclesiastical parishes. In Scotland these are called parishes quoad sacra, while the original parishes which remain such for all purposes are parishes quoad omnia. The original parish when retained for civil, although subdivided for ecclesiastical purposes, is commonly distinguished as the civil parish, in Scotland a parish quoad civilia

Most of the older colonies have parishes, both for ecclesiastical and civil purposes, frequently as electoral districts or divisions, in the newer colonies where there is no established Church the parish has often no official existence, though the Church of England (and, in some cases, other Churches) has applied the name to areas formed for the organization of its own work, and the term is used in the same way by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

[Note. (1) Gr. παροικία was the abstr. sb. from παροικέω adj. (f. παρά by, beside + οἶκος house, dwelling), in cl. Gr. 'dwelling beside or near, neighbouring, a neighbour', in LXX, N.T., and Christian writers, 'dwelling temporarily or sojourning in a foreign land, a sojourner'. As to which of these notions was present, when παροικία passed into ecclesiastical use, opinions differ, the earlier etymologists (Diez, etc.) have taken it as 'the body of persons dwelling beside, and hence, the district lying about, a church or ecclesiastical centre', but more recent writers, founding their conclusions upon the usage of the LXX and N.T., take it as 'the body of sojourners', holding the appellation to have been primarily applied to colonies of Jews of the Dispersion sojourning in Alexandria and other Gentile cities, and to have been from them continued or adopted as a name for 'the Christian brotherhood sojourning in a town or district', perh. not without reference to the spiritual use of παροικία, παροικία (1 Pet. 1. 17, v. 11) see Lightfoot S. Clement II. 6, Hatch in Dict. Chr. Antiq. s. v. Parish. (2) According to Lightfoot, παροικία was at first used in a much more general sense than diocesis, diocese, of which it was later a synonym, as were its L. representatives paracia, parochia down even to the 12th c. The modern sense 'parish' appears already in St. Basil a 370. Although parochia was used in the wider sense at the Councils of Chalcedon 451 and Clovesho 845, and is so rendered even in 12th c. glossaries (cf. W. Wülcker 537/50 Diocesis vel parochia, biseparchie), parish, as an English word, is found only with the modern meaning (exc. when used by later writers as a literal rendering of the Gr. or L. word, sense 5). (3) The relation to the original παροικία, paracia, of later and med. L. parochia, presents difficulty. The latter could not arise out of the former by any normal phonetic process; and it has been suggested by various scholars independently that parochia is really a derivative from parochius (Gr. παροικός), the name of a local official in the country parts of Italy who supplied public personages with entertainment, etc., when they came into his district; and that this familiar term was popularly substituted for the unfamiliar paracia. Cf. what is said under PARROCK, as to the OHG. rendering of parochia by the apparently native parra, parre].

Hence Parished a. (in comb.), having parishes 1864 Life H. Murray in Comment Bible 1 The county is somewhat wide and many-parished.

Parish clerk. An official appointed by the incumbent of a parish to assist in various duties connected with the church and its services: before the Reformation usually a member of one of the five minor orders; after the Reformation a layman, the office being often conjoined with that of sexton; by the Act of 1844, which at present regulates the office, the duties may be undertaken by a curate. See CLERK sb. 2 b.

One of his most prominent duties in former times, that of leading the responses (often without any following) is now generally given up (being performed by the choir and congregation), except at baptisms, funerals, etc.

3. The Great Council of the nation, which forms, with the Sovereign, the supreme legislature of the United Kingdom (formerly of the Realm of England), consisting of the three Estates, namely the Lords Spiritual and Temporal (forming together the House of Lords), and the representatives of the counties, cities, boroughs, and universities (forming the House of Commons). By some legal writers, the Sovereign, as part of the Legislature, is included in the Parliament; but this is not usual.

a. Viewed as a temporary assemblage of persons, summoned by the Sovereign, and after a time (the length of which is now limited) again dissolved, to be succeeded (formerly at an uncertain and often distant interval, but now within a very short period) by another assemblage similarly constituted.

This is, in its origin, merely a development of sense 2, corresponding to the gradual evolution of the modern parliament from the Great Council. Stubbs Const. Hist., following the chroniclers, uses 'parliament' from 1242 onwards; but the 'parliaments' previous to 1275 belong rather to our sense 2, with progressive approaches to this sense.

In this sense the word may be preceded, by a or the, and have a plural; so we speak of a new parliament, or of the first, second, or third parliament of Edward I, or of Queen Victoria, and historians individualize many parliaments by distinctive appellations: see 8.

b. Viewed as a permanent or continuous institution, the composition, character, and size of which have changed from time to time, but which has itself a continuous history. In this sense usually without a or the, or plural (except in speaking of such institutions in different countries, as, 'the Scottish and Irish Parliaments are now incorporated in that of Great Britain').
